Dear Professor Killebrew:

Ever since I was little, dating back as far as elementary school I was always intrigued in doing the experiments, readings, or learnings in my science classes. As time went on, I started looking around for new interest until I reached high school. In high school, I joined an agriculture program where I started to focus on animal science where I studied, learned, and had hands on learning experience in the field. I started studying this area of science because of school but it led to me pursuing it outside of school as well. The area of science I am most naturally drawn to is animal science, this is because I have developed a passion for the field.

In the future, I hope to have a job in the Agricultural field. The impact I hope to have on the science community is to help educate people in cities or urban areas about the field of agriculture. With the experience I have and the experience I hope to gain in the future I hope to introduce people to something new. From animals to plant science I want to introduce people to how their food is made and the work that takes place. I hope to impact the global community by having new people gain an interest in agriculture and have them possibly pursue a career in the field.

For my writing this semester, I hope by the end my writing has improved significantly where I would only have to make minor adjustments or changes when revising, and have a new set of vocabulary, terms, and forms of writing at my disposal. The elements of writing I hope to improve on are structure, vocabulary, punctuation, and grammar. I hope to accomplish these goals by revising my work, reaching out for help, and taking criticism into account.

Sincerely,

George Morales
